How you'll be assessed

We assess approximately 50 per cent of the course through practical rehearsals, presentations and performances. We assess the remainder through essays and workbooks/study journals, reflecting on a critical understanding of drama and theatre and its application to performance. Second and third-year module grades contribute towards your final degree award classification.

The final year of the course contains a compulsory written dissertation and a placement in a theatre or arts institution. Project work forms an important part of the course. Many of the modules are practical in nature and the teaching takes the form of lecture, seminar and practical, studio-based workshops. You're also expected to engage in a wide range of research-based personal assignments.

HOW YOU'LL LEARN

All modules are led by practice and informed by research. You will work individually and collaboratively with others to develop, devise, compose, produce, and perform original work across traditional disciplines of drama, music, and dance.

You will be supported in developing technical and creative skills in sound, lighting and technical theatre, music, movement, voice, composition, and performance, through a range of lectures, workshops and master-classes, and through engagement with industry.

You will study 4 modules per year, covering a range of disciplines and practices. Each year will culminate in a showing of work, and large-scale performance pieces as part of a creative project production module. This will take place in professional performance venues and other sites that explore and express the vibrant diversity of East London.

Who will teach on this course

The teaching team includes qualified academics, practitioners and industry experts as guest speakers. Full details of the academics will be provided in the student handbook and module guides.
